Putting Human Rights into Practice

Miki is a senior consultant in Climate Change and Sustainability Services (CCaSS) at Ernst & Young Japan. Currently she is focused on supporting Japanese companies by providing advice on how to best manage their social impacts and create strategy for this which aligns with the corporate vision and business direction. Prior to joining EY, she worked for Save the Children Japan, an international NGO, and was engaged in a number of projects of humanitarian aids and development assistant projects outside Japan. Miki has extensive working experiences with Japanese companies expanding into emerging markets and developing countries. She has helped these companies consider the business impacts on local communities, and particularly the impact on vulnerable groups like children.

In the field of business and human rights, she served as a secretariat for multi-stakeholder engagements and initiatives focusing on rights of the child and business principles, where she took leading role in developing of cross-sector industry advertising and marketing guidelines to respect children's' rights.

Miki earned her degrees from University of London, University of Sussex, and the University of Law in the UK and previously worked in South Sudan, Sri Lanka, Jordan, Nepal, Afghanistan and India.
